Description :

Prsentation de l'diteurThe Writers Conference takes you into a world most people will never seeLaura Belmont has finished writing her first novel. She hopes it will change her life.Laura quits her job and goes to the Clymer Workshop, one of the oldest writers' conferences in the country. Her plan is to make a connection with one of the famous staff authors or a literary agent who will help her get a publishing contract.From the moment Laura arrives she feels the intensity of two hundred people who are attending the conference for the same reason she is there. The male writers on the staff are more interested in her body than in her manuscript. She goes to creative writing workshops unaware of the literary politics being played in the shadows by the famous authors teaching her the favors made, the courtesies given, the grudges held. Even an author's wife becomes fair game. Laura begins to feel that she's made an expensive mistake. The only offer she gets comes with a veiled threat. Then something extraordinary happens that makes her change her mind.

Biographie de l'auteur Marian Schwartz can't remember a time when she wasn't reading. Books were her escape from the legendary Buffalo, New York winters and probably contributed to her becoming a writer. Now she lives in Central Virginia near the Blue Ridge Mountains, where she enjoys gardening with the exception of fighting deer, who also enjoy her garden by browsing there regularly. In the Giffort Street stories, collected in "Harry Danced Divinely," she re-created the street where she was raised and populated the houses with imaginary characters. Almost every story has at least one room that was like a room in her house. Her novel "Realities" was a selection of the Swedish Book-of-the-Month Club.
